Moving Mountain of Colorado

View of Carbon mountain, three miles south of Durango, Colo., which has awakened from its sleep of untold ages, and with groans and grumbling which can be heard for miles, is slowly but steadily moving away from its base at the edge of the main range. A deep gully from 25 to 150 feet wide now separates the great mass of moving rock from its stationary base. Tons of rocks crash down the opposite side of the mountain daily. Geologists have not been able to determine definitely the cause of the strange phenomenon, which followed an explosion seemingly of a gas pocket.

According to it, "glass windows are actually liquids, but of a very high stickiness."

This theory commends itself to maids, charwomen—and husbands who help with the housework; but whether the housewife, surveying broken glassware, accepts it as a reasonable explanation of the smash is a little doubtful.

Other doubters are those who wear tortoise-shell spectacles. They know that lenses will often survive a fall which smashes the frame. If glass is a liquid, they ask, what is tortoise-shell?—Answers.
