No Vacation for College Summer School Students

There is no summertime pause on the campuses of the colleges and centers which comprise the State University of New York.

President Samuel B. Gould observes that campus activity is literally year-round, with the 1966 summer-month population expected to total more than 80,000 students, compared to 66,500 last year.

In the summer of 1965, more than 36,500 students thronged the four-year and graduate campuses for credit and noncredit courses as well as various institutes and workshops, foreign study and special programs. At the two-year campuses — Community and Agricultural and Technical Colleges — nearly 30,000 summer students attended classes.

A major segment of this summer's scholars comprise persons in the teaching profession, either attending in-service courses, taking courses for permanent certification requirements, or pursuing advanced degree study.

Others include those accelerating or making up courses, beginning or continuing graduate work, and new high school graduates who are aspiring to a college education.

In the latter category are those who have applied for admission to one of the State University's campuses, but do not quite match up to scholastic requirements and are doing remedial work to become eligible.

Still other students are youngsters from low-income families, attending the University under Federally-sponsored Upward Bound projects. They have just entered high school and show a potential for college work, even though their present marks and interests may not evidence it.

The programs and courses are broadly structured to assure depth and quality.

Among offerings this summer will be:

Refresher courses — air conditioning, auto mechanics, computer technology, etc. — for some 450 vocational-industrial teachers, considered to be the biggest summer vocational technical institute in the United States, College at Oswego.

A seminar for prospective teachers of physical education for the retarded, supported by a $29,800 grant from the Joseph P. Kennedy Jr. Foundation, College at Cortland.

A workshop for teachers of children of seasonally employed agricultural workers, College at Geneseo.

A foreign language institute in French, German and Spanish, for supervisors, coordinators and chairmen of foreign language departments in New York schools, College at New Paltz.

A course, "Introduction to Scientific Data Processing," for Air Force personnel at Hancock Air Base, Onondaga Community College.

A music clinic for high school students, College at Fredonia.

An institute for teachers of disadvantaged youth, supported by a $20,181 grant from the State Education Department, State University at Albany.

A workshop on smoking and its relationship to health and disease, College at Buffalo.

A unique course for history teachers, "Cultures of Asia," which will bring professors from Asian universities to the campus to lecture on the cultures of their nations, State University at Buffalo.

An outdoor drama festival, College at Brockport.

A workshop for teachers on "The Art of Music as Therapy for Exceptional Children," College at Potsdam.

A series of lectures and demonstrations on current first aid practices, Westchester Community College.

A workshop on nature and conservation, College of Agriculture at Cornell University.

An undergraduate research participation program in biological sciences, supported by a National Science Foundation grant, College of Forestry at Syracuse.

In addition, more programs than ever before will be offered to insure the chances of qualified high school students being admitted to college and succeeding.

For instance, there are the Upward Bound projects, at State University at Binghamton, College at Plattsburgh, and Kingsborough Community College at Brooklyn. Kingsborough is the first two-year college within the University system and one of the first in the United States to participate.

Under the Economic Opportunity Act, the Binghamton project will be supported by a $71,750 Federal grant involving 50 students from Broome County; Plattsburgh, $145,000 for 100 students from Clinton, Essex and Franklin Counties; and Kingsborough, about $147,000 for 100 from the East New York-Brownsville section of Brooklyn.

The youngsters will receive intensive remedial training in English skills and mathematics, as well as a varied cultural-recreational program consisting of musical and dramatic performances, lectures and tours of museums and historical sites.

President Gould also reports that the College at Buffalo is one of 40 campuses throughout the nation, and the only one in western New York State, that has been selected by the U. S. Office of Education as a summer center for pre-service training for the National Teachers Corps.

Another Federally-supported program at the College at Buffalo will prepare 200 tutors and 20 supervisors for the education portion of the Opportunities Development Corporation's $3 million experiment aimed at Buffalo's hard-core unemployed. The tutors will be trained to help the culturally disadvantaged and bring their standards to at least a Grade 8 level.

Also, the number of campuses offering non-credit remedial courses is increasing each summer. Latest arrival is Erie County Technical Institute, which will be opening its first summer school.

Other campuses with summer opportunity programs for new high school graduates include State University at Albany, Fashion Institute of Technology, Alfred Agricultural and Technical College, Delhi Agricultural and Technical College, Broome Technical College, Dutchess Community College and Jefferson Community College.
