Migrant Labor Clinics initiated in 6 Counties under Federal Aid

Six migrant labor health programs in New York State have received federal grants to expand their health services, Dr. Hollis S. Ingraham, State Health Commissioner, announced today.

Three of the programs, in Monroe, Orange and Ulster counties, will receive federal funds for the first time. Funds for the other three, in Cayuga and Suffolk counties and the Utica District, continue previous grants.

The six grants total $96,314 for the current year. The programs serve some 9,000 migrants and their families, of the estimated 20,000 who work in New York State.

The grants allow addition and expansion of much-needed services to programs already conducted by local health departments and private groups, Dr. Ingraham said. Migrants, the nature of whose employment isolates them, often lack basic health knowledge and services.

The migrant programs will offer such services as pre-natal and child health clinics, general physical examinations, x-rays and laboratory tests, immunizations for children and adults, family planning advice, eye and dental examinations.

If the condition is one the clinic cannot treat, it will arrange an appointment with the needed physician, hospital or dentist. The new funds will allow payments for many practitioners who have previously done this work without charge, Dr. Ingraham said.

The clinics will be held in a variety of places — local hospitals, schools, camp buildings, a physician's office and, in one project, in a specially equipped trailer. The programs will arrange transportation when necessary.

Public health educational efforts will include demonstrations, movies, talks and publications about sanitation, diet, immunization and general health habits.

Health department sanitarians make regular inspection of migrant labor camps, and operating permits may be withheld if living conditions do not meet minimum standards established by the State Sanitary Code.

The Monroe County migrant project, receiving federal funds of $41,381 for the first year, is co-sponsored by the University of Rochester's School of Medicine and Dentistry. Project director is John F. Radebaugh, M.D., of the school's Department of Preventive Medicine and Community Health. The project will serve 800 to 1,200 migrants, most of whom work in the fruit belt in the northwest corner of the county.

The Orange County project, receiving $13,975 this year, is directed by the Orange County Council of Community Services with the Middletown District of the State Health Department.

Most of the 1,500 migrants work in the lettuce, celery and onion farms in the county's "black-dirt" area. A survey made last summer by VISTA volunteers showed that 26 per cent of the workers lost a substantial amount of time from injuries or illness, 11 per cent of the 26 per cent requiring hospitalization. Goshen Hospital will direct immunization clinics at Pine Island School. St. Anthony's Hospital in Warwick will provide examination and treatment rooms and the use of its diagnostic x-ray and clinical laboratories.

The Ulster County project, directed by Vernon B. Link, M. D., county health commissioner, will receive $15,970 this year. Some 1,000 Puerto Ricans and southern Negroes work out of 30 camps, mostly in the apple-growing section in the southwest part of the county. The project will expand work begun by the New Paltz Area Migrant Committee, a group of four apple-growers, four clergymen and eight other interested citizens. Among the services will be a nursery school in the New Paltz American Legion Hall, which the committee started
