More married women covered by Social Security benefits

Almost half of the married women in the nation now work in jobs covered by social security, according to John G. Joly, social security district manager in Ogdensburg.

Over 22 million married women—47.1 percent of them—have jobs outside their homes compared to 43.5 percent 10 years ago, according to the U.S. Department of Labor. Nine out of 10 jobs are covered by social security.

"Working women build social security disability, survivors, retirement, and Medicare protection for themselves and their families," Joly said. "More married women work now than in 1967 because families are smaller and there are more jobs for women."

Monthly social security benefits can be paid to a wife on her work record even if her husband keeps working, according to Joly. "And," he said, "if a woman has worked long enough in jobs covered by social security and then retires, becomes disabled, or dies, her children can be paid benefits on her record until they're 18—or until 22 if they're full-time students in school and remain unmarried."

Medicare starts for most people at 65, he noted. "But disabled people under 65 can get Medicare if they've been entitled to social security disability benefits for at least 24 consecutive months," he said.

Full social security retirement benefits can start when the worker is 65, reduced benefits at 62. Disability benefits can be paid to workers under 65 and their families when the worker is disabled and not expected to be able to do any substantial work for a year or more.

People retiring in 1977 generally can get social security retirement payments with as little as six and one half years of work covered by social security. To get social security disability payments, disabled workers generally need six and one half years of work covered by social security with at least five years of it in the 10 years before the disability began. "But workers disabled before 31 may be eligible for payments with as little as one and one half years of work covered by social security, depending on age," Joly said.
